

Coventry School Committee honors future teachers

By KENDRA GRAVELLE - May 20, 2019

The Coventry School Committee took time during its meeting Thursday to recognize eight graduating seniors who plan to study education at their chosen colleges next year. Pictured from left: Abigail Medeiros, Katelyn Dove, Carleigh Killea, Julie Burgjohann, Megan Robillard, Annabella Rosa and Nathan Macomber. Not pictured: Troy Osterhout.

Megan Robillard, who plans to attend University of Rhode Island, shakes hands with Assistant Superintendent Laurie Andries during Thursday's signing ceremony.

COVENTRY — Annabella Rosa had never imagined that she would one day hope to pursue a career involving children. That was, at least, until she started working at the town summer camp.

“Once I started working there and developed relationships with the kids, I found a huge passion for it,” she said.

Source: https://www.ricentral.com/kent_county_daily_times/coventry-school-committee-honors-future-teachers/article_4ab37082-7b5d-11e9-bb3a-cbe0efad3c23.html

And after looking deeper into the possibility of becoming an educator, Rosa said she grew to love the classroom environment, adding that she now aspires to “teach the younger generation.”

“I just love it,” she continued.

With plans to study education at Rhode Island College after she graduates from Coventry High School next month, Rosa was one of eight students to be recognized during a signing ceremony at the school committee meeting earlier this month. Each of the honored students in the fall will take their first steps toward becoming educators by attending one of several Rhode Island Department of Education-approved programs.

“I’m honored to be here tonight to recognize our aspiring educators,” said Keri Potvin, Coventry’s 2018 District Teacher of the Year, kicking off the brief ceremony.

The recognition award, sponsored by Coventry Public Schools in conjunction with RIDE and the Rhode Island Office of Innovation, was created to “elevate the teaching profession” and “shine light on the excellence and dedication of Rhode Island teachers,” Potvin said.

“The work of an educator can be life-changing,” she continued. “Teachers shape the future, bringing the world to students and inviting them to interact and engage within their world in a meaningful way.”

Potvin was joined by past Milken Educator Award winners Lauren Hopkins and Sue Toohey Kaye, as one-by-one they called the seniors to the front of the council chambers to receive a certificate and a pin: Julie Burgjohann, who will attend Salve Regina University; Carleigh Killea, who will attend Rhode Island College; Katelyn Dove, Nathan Macomber, Abigail Medeiros and Megan Robillard, who will all attend the University of Rhode Island; and Rosa.

Troy Osterhout, unable to attend Thursday’s ceremony, will also attend URI.

“I’m certain that the recipients of this esteemed recognition can attest to their own personal experiences that led each of them to this honorable profession,” Potvin continued.

After shaking the hands of each recipient, school committee members took turns offering well wishes to the soon-to-be Coventry High School alumni.

“I always think what I do is pretty interesting and great until I talk to my brother, who’s also a teacher,” said committee member Luke Murray, who lauded the impact teachers have on young people.

“Good luck and godspeed,” committee member James Pierson chimed in. “Come back to Coventry and teach.”

Katherine Patenaude, chair of the school committee, told the future educators that she “couldn’t be prouder” of them for choosing to pursue teaching.

Patenaude, who trained to be a teacher but spent just one year in the field, said she admires and respects what she called a “noble profession.”

“You’re aspiring to do the best work that can be done,” she said. “To educate our kids and make a society that’s worth living in.”

Source: https://www.ricentral.com/kent_county_daily_times/coventry-school-committee-honors-future-teachers/article_4ab37082-7b5d-11e9-bb3a-cbe0efad3c23.html

And while each student has a unique reason for wanting to enter the education field, for Burgjohann, the decision all came down to her own experiences at Coventry Public Schools.

“I’ve had so many amazing teachers,” Burgjohann said following the ceremony. “I just want to do for kids what they did for me.”